

Theatre Inauguration Ceremony and Symbolic Representation

Abstract: The inauguration of the theatre building in Farkas street can be considered as a landmark of the Hungarian theatre history of Transylvania. The ceremony from 1821 has become a canonical event of Hungarian acting. The study analyzes first how the National Hungarian Theatre was constituted in the frame of the inauguration ceremony referring also to the symbolics of it as a visual and event-like frame of theatre historical remembrance.

Then, will focus on two anniversary celebrations (from 1871 and 1892), in order to analyze how various elements of the anniversary celebrations relate to each other in the context of the institutionalization process.

Keywords: 19th century, Transylvania, theatre anniversary celebration, institutionalization, invented tradition

After 18 years of construction works,<sup>2</sup> the first Hungarian stone theatre, called also the Hungarian National Stage from Transylvania was opened on Belső-Farkas street in downtown Kolozsvár (Cluj) finally on March 12, 1821. The ground hall had twelve blue chandeliers decorated with silver, while the foreground and the corridors leading to the boxes were illuminated with 9 oil lamps. Two hundred candles were lit in the inner spaces of the theatre (the candlesticks in slat supports could be pull up and lower with the help of chains to illuminate the stage and the seats of the musicians, and also the fly loft) at the evening spectacle which started at 6 o'clock. The theatre entrance was also illuminated by two square oil lamps of great size.

Although the original building plan cannot be found, we have a few sources<sup>3</sup> on the basis of which some aspects of the building (i.e. its seating capacity, spatial design and image) may be reconstructed. According to Lázár Káli Nagy, the supervisor of the construction works, the stage was built on the basis of the stage of Theatre an der Wien (The Theatre on the Wien River). Completed in 1801, the Viennese theatre was described as the most lavishly equipped and one of the largest theatres of its age. The usual machinery for rapid changing of the scenery with wheel system was located below the stage. The height of the building made it possible to vertically raise the backdrops. The basic part of the scenic props (curtains, painted drops, sets of legs, and borders) were realized by the scene painter of Vienna's Burgtheater, and the chandelier of the auditorium had been manufactured also in Vienna. There has been made a front curtain, an act drop, stage backdrops that indicated three rooms (a saloon, a rustic room, a classic hall), a garden, a street and a gaol equipped with 40 legs and 11 borders. The costumes were brought by the company, and a few aristocrats also enriched the theatrical costume equipments and supplies.

Having a comfortable seating capacity of 1,200, but being able to stay up to 1,500 people, the auditorium consisted of the stall, then three tiers of boxes painted in blue (lower tier of boxes 15, the second tier 17, while the third had 18 boxes) which could seat between 340-500 people. The stalls seating area had 80 seats, and the first rows featured 32 benches suitable to seat 100 people. The space between the seats and benches of the stalls could pack up to 300 people. The orchestra pit was suitable for 19 musicians to seat around 9 music benches. The gallery provided 300 seats and additional standing room for up to 200 viewers.

According to the minutes of the National Theatre Committee responsible for the functioning of the institution, the 50 boxes within the auditorium were distributed among the aristocrats who supported the construction of the theatre building;<sup>4</sup> from among these 24 were given for good to aristocrats (both men and women) and their families who gave substantial sums to the cause.<sup>5</sup>

The inauguration ceremony is well-suitable to study aspects related to the construction of historical remembrance. Since the event didn't have any precedents (at least not in Hungarian language), it can be considered as a 19th century invention, and more specifically, from a historian's position, we can view it as an 'invented tradition' in the sense of Eric Hobsbawm's and Terence Ranger's terms.<sup>6</sup> Its organization served as a model for following theatrical celebrations, while the event as a whole was an opportunity for the active participants to review, on the one hand, the past of Hungarian acting, while on the other hand, to look into its future and face challenges related to the inevitable cultural and social changes which would occur. Especially if we take the two theatre celebrations of the nineteenth century following the 1821 opening ceremony, both practices (that is looking back and looking ahead) are visible not only in the organization and performance of the events but also in the specific mixture/blend of institutional legitimisation and symbolic presentation of cultural expectations of the era.

In what follows, I will examine the program of the two-day festivities organized for the opening of the theatre in Farkas street with the purpose to explore how the Hungarian National Theatre was constituted in the frame of the celebrations. I will also focus on the significances attached to the function and role of the institution through the language of the celebration (by analyzing, besides the Prologue, the verses of the song sung by the choir, and other related sources), and also on the function(s) of the plays performed during the celebrations. Further more, I will refer to the symbolics of the ceremony as a visual and event-like frame of theatre historical remembrance.

On examining the previously mentioned two anniversary celebrations (the fiftieth anniversary of the theatre opening at the beginning of April 1871 and the centenary of Hungarian acting in Transylvania as celebrated on November 10 and 11, 1892) I will consider the degrees to which the old models set by the inauguration ceremony could be adapted to the new contexts of the anniversaries.

How Was the Festivity Constructed?

The Hungarian Theatre from Cluj had an aristocratic character not only in terms of its sponsorship or funding,<sup>7</sup> but also in terms of membership in the National Theatre Committee which was responsible for the management of the company;<sup>8</sup> moreover, the Committee employed the members of the company as well.

They also organized the inauguration ceremony so its schedule can be found in the official documents of the Committee. However, certain decisions (which were taken after semi-official or private talks) cannot be revealed. During the meeting held on February 11, 1821 the Committee appointed its members who became responsible for organizing the ceremony; accordingly, the organizing committee was chaired by P. Horváth Dániel, while its members were the following: count Dénes Bánffy, count László Lázár, baron József Naláczi, count József Csáky and baron Miklós Kemény.<sup>9</sup> Then, during the meeting held on March 14 to debate and eventually adopt the new theatre regulation. They defined the competences for the theatre managers who would lead the company and manage the institution.<sup>10</sup> The new theatre regulation contained three parts: 1. the basic regulation which described the functioning of the company; 2. the obligations of the stage directors (regisseurs), and 3. the instructions for the censors and the managers of the theatre.<sup>11</sup> According to the regulation, the Committee exercised leadership in every aspect. Moreover, a sub-committee chaired by the (general) manager had the right to impose penalties.

Baron Dániel Petrichevich Horváth, the Commission chair, fully supported the establishing and functioning of the theatre. He was also member of the construction commission, and paid 1,000 forints to own a theatre box. Previously, between December 1813 – March 1814, he had been the manager of the theatre company which had been performing in the ex-stable (owned by count Wesselényi Miklós) transformed into theatre building. In his period, the library of the theatre acquired several new drama-texts. During the winter of 1814 Petrichevich organized an amateur company of aristocrats (Uri Játzó Társaság in Hungarian) which performed German, French and Hungarian plays mainly in the governor's saloon.<sup>12</sup> He also had an essential role in shaping the program of the inauguration celebration.

On March 12 the new theatre building was opened at six o'clock in the evening. Baron Petrichevich was the first to appear on the stage: he recited the Prologue (Előszó) written by himself. Next, the students of the Musical Association of Cluj („kolozsvári muzsikai egyesület”) performed the choir song written for the occasion (entitled A nemzet innepe az erdélyi magyar játékszín kinyitásakor [The Nation's Celebration on the Opening of the Hungarian Theatre from Transylvania]). The highlight of the first evening was the performance of the 5-act heroic bourgeois tragedy Zrínyi by the aforementioned amateur acting company. Showing heavy influences of Schiller, the play had been written by the German playwright Theodor Körner; its Hungarian translation was provided by Petrichevich-Horváth himself, who also assumed the title role. (Otherwise the play had already been performed twice in 1819, on the birthday of the governor, count Bánffy György and the following day.)<sup>13</sup>

The professional acting company came on stage only the following day (on March 13); they performed King Mathias/Mathias Corvinus, an original Hungarian sentimental drama written by László Szentjóni Szabó.

The Prologue for the Occasion

The text written and presented by Petrichevich Horváth Dániel was published first in the book entitled Játékszíni Koszorú [Stage Wreath]<sup>14</sup> by Könyves Máté in 1834, then it appeared in the publication Emléklap [Commemorative Card]<sup>15</sup> issued for the 1871 commemoration of the theatre opening. The newspapers of the era republished it as well, along the choir song's text and the playbill of the Zrínyi tragedy.

The Prologue may be read as both a theatre-opening official speech and an argument for the staging of the tragedy. The emphasis was on the national and autohtone features as key elements for the symbolic occupation of both the building space and the local theatre culture.

The beginning of the prologue describes the Hungarian acting stage as being without a property of its own; in this sense, it is evoking the theatrical initiatives from the end of the 18th century which would finally have a building of its own.

The construction of the building holds out the promise of revival for Hungarian acting, while the acting is defined as heart stirring, luring and beautiful craft/profession:

*Úgy is tudjuk, mi a sorsa
A legkedvesebb Actornak.
Tudjuk azt, hogy nem terjedhet
Kellemeinek érzése
Századokra, mint Apelles
Ecsettyének vonásai. (...)
Bájos szép mestersége
Ereje csak addig terjed;
Míg szavai elhangzottak,
És a visszhang megszűntével,
Borostyánja el is alszik.
We know anyway the fate
Of the dearest Actor.
[We know that the feeling
Of his good features cannot Encompass centuries like
The strokes of Apelles' brush (...)
The power of his luring and beautiful profession
Lasts only until his words,
And the echo ceases
Together with the light
Of its amber.]<sup>16</sup>*

According to the Prologue, the company of aristocrats, by daring to open the national theatre, made not only an act of celebrating the theatre, is a sanctifier gesture animated by patriotic feelings and giving it honour and rank (i.e. since they belong to the first estate).

The choice for the Zrínyi tragedy is motivated by evoking the great Hungarian nobleman and general in service of Habsburg Monarchy, ban of Croatia. In 1566, from August 5 to September 7 his small force (2,300 soldiers) heroically defended the little fortress of Szigetvár against the whole Ottoman host (102,000 soldiers), led by Suleiman the Magnificent in person. The Battle of Szigetvár ended with Zrínyi perishing with every member of the garrison and his family, thus blocking Suleiman's line of advance towards Vienna. Zrínyi's heroic gesture is motivated by patriotic feeling, love and loyalty to his Habsburg Monarch.

The martyrdom of Zrínyi resonates with the sacrifice brought for the theatre. The Prologue finally called for cheering:

Víg trombiták harsogjatok!!! [Loudly let the trumpets bray!]

The cheer and vivat were meant for Francis I, the last Holy Roman Emperor, who was also the Apostolic King of Hungary as I. Ferenc.<sup>17</sup> The praise and gratitude went to the local representatives of political power, who were of course present at the inauguration (for e.g., count György Bánffy, the chief of the Gubernium was viewing the show from the central box located in the second tier of boxes). The theatre was completed thanks to the support received from the governor as well. Count Bánffy claimed a separate box also for his family.<sup>18</sup> The glorification of the monarch, and his representatives (the government and governor) were not just courtesy gestures, but acts of obedience and pledges of loyalty.

The Choir Song

The choir song entitled A nemzet innepe az erdélyi magyar játékszín kinyitásakor [The Nation's Celebration on the Opening of the Hungarian Theatre from Transylvania] was composed by young Zsigmond Szentkirályi (1804–1870, the son of Miklós

However, according to article 6 of the law from 1791 - which stipulated that Transylvania was part of the Hungarian Kingdom so that the House of Habsburg had the same right to command over it, - also stated that Transylvania had its own constitution which should serve for governing the territory according to its subsequent laws and rules. Szentkirályi (1772-1836), the royal judge of the town, and performed by the students of the musical association of Cluj („kolozsvári muzsikai egyesület”) which was in fact the music academy of the town.<sup>19</sup> Although in his monography about the Hungarian musical theatre of Cluj the author István Lakatos only refers to the fact that the choir of the music school collaborated in the event, the documents of the Musical Association reveal much more about the organization of the festivities.<sup>20</sup>

According to the minutes of the association, the music director Antal Hollaki invited the Commission of the association to his house to discuss the choir song which would be performed at the ceremony. The invitation had been sent to 16 persons but only 9 showed up, among them the conductors József Grosspeter and Antal Polz clavier master. The latter was instructed to gather the singers and also to select beautiful and soothing musical pieces for the orchestra to play in between the acts of Zrínyi tragedy, so that 'we could show our respect which is appropriate for the Hungarian nation'. However, the music pieces selected for the orchestra weren't recorded in the minutes of the meeting, we also learn from the minutes that costs were supported by the Theatre Committee.<sup>21</sup>

With a few exceptions, the verses of the song by Zsigmond Szentkirályi much resemble the festive language of the Prologue. Having biblical vocabulary, the song contains references to antique texts, to the history of Hungary, as well as to Hungarian ancestors. The song calls metaphorically the lack of a theatre building as 'ideas trembling on sad remains of Fate', while the completion of the stone theatre a dream coming true: „beatiful dream rocking on the blooming Olympos". The figure of the governor appears as a power protecting the newly established institution („Csak Nagy Bánfy' szárnyainak / Terjedjen rá oltalma").

According to the song, the day of joy is marked by the Hungarian sky shining beyond the sun, the moon and the eagle. These symbols were visible also in the space of the theatre, as they were carved onto the golden board above the stage. In the crest of Transylvania, the eagle represents the counties, the sun and the moon the Szeklers, since the theatre building could be completed thanks to the donations from these two estates.

Praise, respect and gratitude were put into rhyme and the verses repeated in refrain (Jöjjetek hát, jöjjetek már / A' tisztelet itt régen vár; A háladás' sas' szárnyain / Lebegjen mejjünk' árnyain. Come, oh come already/ The honour is waiting for a long while for you; The Eagle fan of gratitude/Let be float on our bosom shade) were in fact equivalent with ritualized and formalised gestures. The last strophe sounds much like a prayer for God's blessing, for the undisturbed rule of the king, and for peace in both Hungary and Transylvania.

The choir song was conducted by the previously mentioned conductor, Antal Polcz, who was also the music master at the court of the chief governor.<sup>22</sup>

The Zrínyi tragedy

The role of the hero of Szigetvár was played by Dániel Petrichevich-Horváth himself, who, according to the memoirs of the famous actress Déryné, could have become a good professional actor.<sup>23</sup> Other important characters were played by the governor's son in law, count József Csáky (as Szolimán) and the governor's daughter, countess Csáky (as Éva, the heroine, wife of Zrínyi). Other roles were distributed also mainly to aristocrats: the young count Pál Bethlen acted as Mechmet Szokolovits; baron József Bornemisza as Ibrahim; baron Miklós Bánffy as Ali portuk; Gergely Barcsay as Mustafa; baroness Mária Inczédi as Ilona, the daughter of Zrínyi; count

23. Daniel Petrichevich Horváth had also written a few original plays and translated plays. (See Déryné, Naplója, Vol. 2, ed. József Bayer (Budapest, [1900]), 175. For his writings see: the 'Horváth Dániel (széplaki Petrichevich)' entry in József Szinyei, Magyar írók élete és munkái I–XIV (Budapest: Hornyánszky, 1891–1914) <http://mek.oszk.hu/03600/03630/html/>

János Rhédei played the character of Gáspár Alapi; count János Teleki as Farkas Paprutovits; the elderly count Pál Bethlen was Péter Újlaki, and the role of the young hero and Ilona's suitor, Lőrinc Juranics was played by count János Bethlen (the father of the young count Miklós Bethlen, who, performing under the stage name Bolnai, became a professional actor at the middle of the 19th century.)<sup>24</sup> A few bourgeois person were given smaller roles: for e.g. a military ambassador (played by Menasági); a Turkish military leader (aga, played by Miklós Iszlai); the servant of Zrínyi (played by Sámuel Deáky); a peasant (played by Incze); a Hungarian captain (by Végheli). According to the playbill, the scenes took place „either in Belgrád or in Sziget; depicting the places where the story happened in 1566”. Otherwise the display and spectacle of the locations hasn't been emphasized on the playbill.

The visuality of the performance was provided by the diversity of the costumes and various props (guns, armors, flags and torches) and much less by the spectacle of scenic design. We may note that the staging practice of the era used neither period dress nor period sets.<sup>25</sup> The noble amateurs actors obviously put an emphasis on both the Hungarian and Turkish dresses, thus we can say that the costumes were more important in conveying theatrical illusion, although historical accuracy wasn't elemental in this regard either. At the end of the performance the amateur actors donated the costumes to the wardrobe of the professional acting company.<sup>26</sup>

Although it is hard to believe, there hasn't been any report about this significant series of theatre events,<sup>27</sup> so any conclusion to be taken will be based on sporadic data. In terms of scenical possibilities, the spectacle of the performance couldn't have departed from the usual patterns of scenery (though the stage director György Simonfy enriched the scene by adding a few scenic elements) used in heroic play (helden spiele in German/ vitézi játék in Hungarian) a very popular type of play in the 1810's in Hungary.<sup>28</sup> In any case, they must have used the already mentioned sceneries at disposal, and namely the classic hall and the salloon painted backdrop with their side-drops (legs) and borders to represent the various inner spaces: the room within the palace in Belgrad / belgrádi palotában való szoba (I. 1-7.) /; the palace from Szigetvár / szigetvári nagy szoba (I. 7-11.– II.1-9.), Szigetvári palota [nyilván szoba] (III. 6-10.) /; the tent of the Turkish emperor near Sziget / Török császár sátora Sziget alatt (III. 1-5; IV. 1-7.) /; the vault from Sziget / Szigetbe pintze boltozat (IV. 8-9 – V. 1-6.) / . Outside scenes like the court of the castle from Sziget / a Szigeti vár udvara (II. fv. 10-14.; V. 7-8.) / could be easily arranged by using the curtain representing the garden, while for the final big scene they must have painted a backdrop representing the fortress of Szigetvár and must have provided smoke and torches to symbolize the castle in flames; however, we found no evidence in this regard among the payments of the theatre registered for 1821.<sup>29</sup> But we found payments in sum of 8 ft. for timber-work suggesting that quite a few stage/scene elements (or even a fortress) had been built for staging the Zrínyi Miklós tragedy. Further sum (2 ft) paid for the trumpeter suggests that they must have made use of musical instruments to emphasize the battle scene.<sup>30</sup>

King Mathias

Although the drama piece was taken in inventory, its textbook is missing from the library of the Hungarian National Theatre from Cluj. Moreover, its playbill is also missing. In 1871 some newspaper articles dealt with the 1821 theatre inauguration, reediting some documents of it, even if it was achievable then, no information was communicated about the playbill cast or any other information related to this performance.

However, from the memoirs of the actor Göde István we learned that he was the actor to speak first in the play (he played the palatine of Gara).<sup>31</sup> On the basis of theatrical lines of the era we can only suspect that Celesztin Pergő must have played the leading role, while the actress Anna Ungár must have been Pogyebrád Katalin, Borbára Simény was Erzsébet, and the elderly József Székely must have played the character of Mihály Szilágyi. The actress Mária Néb was also playing, only we don't know which character.

The 1871 Celebration

The fifty-year celebration of the theatre opening took place under the theatre manager and entrepreneur Antal Fehérváry. First, the commemoration was postponed due to lack of concordance. Then, the professional acting company held a preliminary celebration on March 11 which was considered the day the stone theatre was opened. However, the commission supervising the theatre the National Theatre Committee (consisting of members of the local political elite, high-ranking officials and the intellectual elite)<sup>32</sup> decided that a greater celebration should be organized. Therefore, apart from local performers, they invited famous actors from the National Theatre from Pest and also two old actors who participated in the opening ceremony from 12 March 1821. As the organizing process was longer than expected, the festivities finally took place on April 1 and 2.

The program of the celebration organized by the professional acting company had three parts: first, the whole theatre personnel sang the 'Hymn' of Kölcsey; then, the actress Laura Sz. Mátray recited a Prologue written by Gerő Szász (1831-1904), a priest and archbishop and well-known local poet, which was followed by the Allegóriai kép [Allegorical tableau vivant] accompanied with coloured illumination directed by the theatre director Fehérváry himself. The second part consisted of a performance of an original one-act comedy called Becsületszó [Honour] written by József Szigeti, actor and playwright of the National Theatre from Pest. The third part of the festive program consisted of the first act of the famous Hungarian opera Bánk bán (by Ferenc Erkel) with the Magyar tánc [Hungarian Dance] as performed by the dance group of the theatre.

The two-day festive program of the National Theatre Committee was organized for the benefit of the theatre's pension fund. Among the personalities invited we can mention the actors and actresses of the National Theatre from Pest: Róza Laborfalvi Jókainé, Kornélia Prielle, Kálmán Szerdahelyi, Miklós Feleki, and also Krisztina Bogdanovics, a promising young actress. The authors of the two plays (Ede Szigligeti and Mór Jókai) which were performed at the festivities were also present at the performances.

The festive program on April 1 was the following:

First, the whole staff of the theatre went on stage to perform the Magyar nemzeti himnusz [Hungarian National Hymn] written by Sándor Berta and arranged by Jakab Jákobi, the conductor of the theatre. The already mentioned priest and poet Geró Szász wrote another Prologue the central idea of which was the gratitude felt toward the predecessor actors. The verses resembled Árpád ébredése [The Awakening of Árpád], an allegorical play written by the famous Hungarian poet Mihály Vörösmarty for the opening performance of the Hungarian Theatre from Pest in 22 August 1837. (for e.g. the syntagms of 'Árpád nemzetének édes szava' [The sweet words of Árpád's clan] and 'Sírjuk feltárul' [Their grave are opening up]).<sup>33</sup> The prologue was recited by Gyula E. Kovács, the leading actor of the company. This was followed by the Tableau vivant entitled Apotheosis as directed by the theatre manager Antal Fehérváry in three parts: 1. A harcok kora [The time of battles]; 2. A nemzeti irodalom felvirágzása [The revival of national literature]; 3. A magyar Tháliának emelt első oltár 1821 március 11-én [The first altar erected on March 11, 1821 for the Hungarian Thalia]. The last part involved also the actors Mária Néb and István Göde, who participated at the inauguration ceremony in 1821. The tableau vivant arranged for the event represented the respect for the past of the theatre and was meant to induce the cultural memory of the theatregoers. The cultic attitude toward the old actors on the stage, was, according to the press, blenched the cold spectacle of the greek fire „elhalványították a görögtűz hideg csillogását”.<sup>34</sup> The imposing episodes (the revival of national literature and the first altar erected for the Hungarian Thalia) effected a kind of sacred space. The Apotheosis was followed by a veneration expressed for the king and his wife, who were presented as the highest patrons of the theatre (Hódolat, ő cs. Kir. Apostoli felségeik dicsőségesen uralkodó királyunk és királynénknak ezen színház legm. Pártfogóinak). The enwreathed picture of the monarch's and his wife was met with much applause. The second part of the program consisted of the performance of an original comedy written by the well-known Hungarian playwright Ede Szigligeti (A bajusz).

In accordance with the decision of the organizing commission, on April 2 the theatre company performed a four-act tragedy written by the famous Hungarian novelist Mór Jókai. Entitled Szigetvári vértanúk (The martyrs of Szigetvár), the play evoked the festive performance of Zrínyi at the 1821 theatre opening. Performed by guest actors from Pest, the play featured also new, for e.g. Miklós Feleky, the actor playing the leading role performed in costume tailored especially for the occasion, while Jókainé, the wife of the playwright was Anna. The play was directed by Gyula E. Kovács. The performance was a success; the audience reacted with ovation and followed the Jókai couple to their housing with torches. The playbill advertised also a brochure published for the occasion (sold for 20 krajcár/pennies). Moreover, even medallion of golden, silver and bronze had been minted; however, they were finished only after the celebration.<sup>35</sup>

Another significant event of the anniversary was the dinner (party) organized in the Redoute building on March 31; then, the following day, according to the newspaper Magyar Polgár, Manó Péchy, the royal commissioner invited the actors (both the guests from Pest and the members of the company from Cluj), important literary personalities and members of the Theatre Committee to join a toast.<sup>36</sup>

On the hundred year anniversary of Hungarian acting in Cluj, the 1821 theatre opening was commemorated as an important moment of the theatre institutionalization process; however, it constituted only a part of the country-wide celebrations. Serious preparations, meetings and consultations preceded the events which celebrated the hundred year anniversary together with the birth day of József Katona, the great Hungarian playwright, whose national tragedy Bánk bán was banned from stages in the neo-absolutist period. We should add that research found that the two dates didn't coincide (the opening performance of the professional acting company from Cluj was on 14 December 1792).<sup>37</sup>

The preparatory consultations involved, beside the organising commission and a few members of the acting company, also the intellectual elite of the town.<sup>38</sup> In the end the local Literary Society celebrated the event on November 10 by performing Bánk bán; then, on November 11, a memorial plaque was unveiled at Rhédey palace (where the first Hungarian professional company started its performances, today at the corner of Napoca street), which was followed by a festive lunch and a gala performance. The street of the theatre was illuminated, and the audience was welcomed by a richly decorated and illuminated theatre building/auditorium. The event was met with much interest; among the invited guests were the royal couple. To sense the overwhelming dimensions of the event one should look at the number of invited guests: 52 delegates representing 16 judicial authorities sent; 37 delegates representing 17 scientific, literary, artistic and cultural societies; 12 delegates representing 8 theatres; and 17 journalists from 14 newspapers. Apart from the invited guests, various bodies from Cluj town (30 in total) reported to send 74 representatives.

The gala started with the festive overture (composed by Gyula Káldy); it was followed by the prologue of Mór Jókai, then by a dramatic description of the period entitled Száz év előtt [Hundred Years Ago], written by Zoltán Ferenczi. The festive program also included a medley of old Hungarian operas compiled by Ottó Müller, as well as the comedy Jártas-költés vőlegény (A well-groomed groom) by László Bartsai and tableaux vivants arranged on the basis of the Zrínyi play. The gala was repeated on November 12.

Conclusions

The theatre-opening play Zrínyi was met in 1821 with some discontent by the public because of, on the one hand, its atmosphere was not 'authentically' Hungarian, while on the other hand, its author was not Hungarian (see for e.g., the critical review of the play by Ferenc Kölcsey).<sup>39</sup> Then, the 1871 staging must have exerted a different effect, due to the fact that it was a different adaptation. On the hundred-year anniversary, they turned to the tradition set in 1821 by creating tableaux vivants on the basis of two dramatically important moments of Körner's play (this genre was very popular during the period). And the performers were selected from among the historical families whose members supported the building of the stone theatre; thus, the organizers provided a familial continuation for the participants.

The role and function of the theatre opened in 1821 was to become both a 'national property' and workshop for 'cultivating the language',<sup>40</sup> and 'an instrument for enriching culture and promoting virtue'.<sup>41</sup> Further attributes of the new institution were 'to protect the national treasure' (see Minutes), and 'serve the pleasure/delight of the heart'.<sup>42</sup> These elements can be found also at 1871 celebration (for e.g., according to the prologues of Gerő Szász, 'the [theatre]house is a temple', while the event was the 'celebration of language, poetry and the arts). It is important to note that the abovementioned functions do not appear as evidence that needs to be provided because they were considered as having been fulfilled during the fifty-year functioning of the theatre. Although the aspect of entertainment within the texts written for the occasion is as a latent presence only, the staged comedies and the tableaux vivants have served this specific purpose. In terms of its language and agenda, the emphasis of the 1892 anniversary was transferred on the practical issue of having a continuous, uninterrupted theatre in town, on the need to fund the theatre similar to the National Theatre form Pest (the Theatre Commission attempted to solve this by political means). It is interesting in this regard that the prologue of Jókai featured some theatre historical elements – for e.g. the play entitled Titkos ellenkezés [Secret resistance], and the name of count Wesselényi – which only signal that the text was written for the festive occasion; otherwise, it is built on the opposition between Hungary and Transylvania where the latter plays the role of preserving the [Hungarian] language).

In 1821, the national theatre culture was much more linked to the theatrical activity of two rather different social groups; in other words, the picture of the heterogeneous society was well-represented by the two-day event.

The theatre was opened the first day with the active participation of the politically influent members of the local aristocracy (quite a few members of the Theatre Commission acted in the Zrínyi performance). This group of amateur aristocratic actors supported the acting company since the first theatrical performance in Cluj (1792) and the placement of the acting company under national supervision (1795), and took up financially the case of the constructing an independent theatre building (since 1805). It is worth mentioning that members of the amateur company had been acting for a few years before appearing the new theatre stage to perform the Zrínyi tragedy.

Among the performers of the second day, we find among the regular members of the newly established acting company significant actors of the era: József Székely (who became a member of the acting company from Cluj in 1802, Borbára Simény (she became a member in 1803), Anna Ungár (in 1806) and Czelesztin Pergő (in 1810). All of them remained actors of the Cluj stage. Although they had a say with regard to what to perform at the theatre opening, the final decision was taken by the Theatre Commission; therefore, we can conclude that the professional artists supported the taste of the aristocracy/elite in power. The play King Mathias by László Szentjóni had been part of the repertoire of the acting company from Cluj since 1804; being a sentimental play written for the crowning of I. Ferenc, it seemed like an appropriate choice to express the gratitude and loyalty, since both the local representatives of the ruling power and the king were specified/mentioned in the festive speech and in the verses of the choir song.

Beside the hierarchical organization of the theatre functioning, at least the same importance should be given to the community-building aspect of participating in theatre building (which aspect I believe is stronger than the belonging to certain social groups). In this regard, I only mention the fact that Gábor Döbrentei, the famous Hungarian critic of the era, established the democratic context of the theatre as an important centre of social life at the beginning of 19th century Cluj, by emphasizing the presence in a common space which entailed the possibility to dissolve differences between theatregoers of different social ranks or confessional groups.<sup>43</sup>

The 1871 anniversary was held in the theatre building transformed according to the professional needs of the era.<sup>44</sup> The renovated theatre-interior of the institution by the significant removal of the governor's box (1865) anticipated the political constitutional frame that was to be established by the Austro-Hungarian Compromise of 1867. By this time, the politics of the Theatre Committee was not so much involved into the professional management of the theatre. The reason for this was the advanced stage of professionalization and institutionalization, which meant that decisions concerning membership, personnel and staging were now taken by theatre professionals, while the Committee acted as supervising and approving board, and supported the functioning of the theatre through the political and social relations of its members. As a result, the 1871 anniversary consisted of two separate events: the first organized by the professional acting company, and the second by the National Hungarian Theatre Committee.

However, we should observe that the 1821 opening constructed a tradition which was strongly emphasized at the 1871 anniversary, the key components of which were the prologue and the historical theme of Zrínyi's martyrdom. The 1871 anniversary saw an adaptation to a different social and theatrical context, which can be revealed by the use of various forms of communication enabled by both technical progress and dissemination possibilities. As opposed to the lack of media coverage of the opening ceremony, the fifty-year anniversary was extensively dealt with by the local press, thus it became a major cultural event for the literate social groups.

The 1892 celebration became much more professional in this sense; the event enjoyed popularity across historical Hungary and Transylvania and was extensively reported in the national press. The various components of the ceremony (such as unveiling a commemorative plaque on Rhedey palace, the festive lunch with their ceremonial toasts, the procession on the streets of
